As a children's pastor, I often get asked for resources that can help families go deeper when their kids ask some tough questions. So when I was asked about a book that might help a family talk about miracles together, I found CASE FOR FAITH FOR KIDS by Lee Strobel, Rob Suggs, and Robert Elmer. This book takes the basic ideas from CASE FOR FAITH and simplifies them to the point where a 3rd - 5th grader might be better able to understand the conversations, questions, and logical arguments behind faith. There are a few main questions asked here, such as:- Why would a good God allow bad things?- Does science mean miracles can't happen?- Can other religions get us into heaven?- Can I have doubts and still be a Christian? The answers provided to these questions are well-researched and include conversations with scholars and theologians including Peter Kreeft, Bill Craig, and Ravi Zacharias. The discussion are not trite or dismissive of hard questions and hard truths. Strobel dives in to some of the most difficult aspects of these questions while still keeping things at kid-level. There are some basic assumptions made here however. For instance, during the discussion of the problem of evil in the world, Strobel takes the theological stance that people have free will, and does not deal with the topics of predestination and predetermination. I didn't find this to be a problem necessarily, but parents should be aware of the framework from which Strobel view these questions. The last section of the book contains four short stories that deal loosely with the topics presented in the first half of the book. These stories seemed a little confusing to follow, and I had time keeping straight what exactly was happening in each one.
